THE SYRACUSE UNIVERSITY INTERNATIONAL LEGAL STUDIES PROGRAM

Despite dogmatic claims to the effect that, in law schools the size of Syracuse University College of Law, students' needs for international legal studies can be satisfied by one well-conceived course, more and more of these schools are developing a spectrum of such offerings. No matter how wide its scope or how "well-conceived" it may be, no single course can allocate the time or provide the materials for in-depth studies in definite problem areas like a spectrum of offerings can. Moreover, in the present state of world affairs, the increase in international trade, travel and investment generates a need for lawyers conversant with the many legal aspects of international transactions involving individuals, corporations and governments. To enable selected students to take advantage of the expanding career opportunities in this area of public law, the College of Law has instituted an International Legal Studies Program.

Under this program, a student wishing to enrich his regular schedule with one or more courses within the program may do so. A limited number of students, normally from the upper half of their class, are permitted at the end of the first year to elect specialization in international legal studies. Students are selected on the basis of their first year record, their special interest, their previous study, or their practical experience in international affairs.

A student participating in the program takes general courses in International Law, International Business Transactions, and Comparative Law. The work extends over the student's last four semesters. In addition to the general courses, a student may take courses and seminars in the International Law of the Sea, International Space Law, War Crimes, Admiralty and International Organizations, if any or all of these are being offered at appropriate times. With the approval of the Director of International Legal Studies, a graduate course or seminar in another division of the University may be taken. On an experimental and contingent basis, some students may also, provided the appropriate approvals are given and conditions met, study for a semester, or no more than one year, in one of the Schools or Colleges of London University.

The Syracuse Journal of International Law and Commerce has been created as an organ of expression for students with an interest in international legal and commercial studies. Its primary purpose is the training of students in the skills of legal writing and research. Student editors are chosen from the second year class on the basis of interest and prior achievement. All students, however, are encouraged to submit contributions to the Journal.
