JESSE TRUESDELL PECK
By
Mary Karr
Actuarial

Sure she was old, smoked like a tarkiln, never hit a lick at exercise and made a steady diet of summer sausage, cheese and what she called the occasional Ho-Ho, but her absence seems so aberrant that while insurance charts show her misled life lopped off years back,
I endlessly replay her death. How she said,

I've outlived all I know to do, and I said, You teach everyone you see how the body wanes, it's brevity here. And she shot back,

Well hell, anybody old does that. But only she instructed me on love's burdens. That she really didn't want to hear, so didn't. Eyelids hinge. Last breath.
While Master snores under cloudy poufs of comforter, Cat enjoys a tail-whipping interval on the bed's border, licks paws as if recently done with twelve-course feast of mouse, while pondering full extent of Master's dumbness, which renders him incapable of scooping from the rodent hole even the slowest gray mouse, so Cat always has to do it for him. As if in thoughtless gratitude for this fact, Master at that instant unrolls, opening broad warm chest for visit. Cat, both forgiving and enticed, delicately steps aboard the body boat, tentatively turns around. With front paws sunk in belly dough, Cat hoists her tail like a flag and backs her hind parts up so Master can get a whiff of and open his eyes to her little stink star. Master, pissed, hurls Cat into the roiling ocean off the bed's edge and follows Cat's spreadeagled form with first one then another pillow. Cat skids, retreats around the corner, then draws up into her most Egyptian form, from which she prisses off thinking, albeit wordlessly, I'm what they named it after.

When I leave, it goes with me.
In A Time of War

Somewhere people are singing though leaves have been seared from trees, though mounds of dirt hide eyeholes threaded through by worms. The old sift through sand for grain spilled from passing trucks. The young have found sticks to wield against invisible dragons.
A white rag tied to a broom their only standard.
In the scorched field, their fake spears and bayonets part the dry stalks.

Each is a mouth ready for kisses.
Each ribcage holds the misty atmosphere of hope.
No pain can smother it.

Against the poisoned sky, the black branches scratch like bare nerve endings. Inhale, exhale. Clear the rubble.
Yoke the beast to the plow.
Plunge the stob in the earth and drop the seeds.
Shine on each other. Sing.
The Ice Fisherman

hacked a hole because Grandpa Dan pronounced way long ago, Huge as a Cadillac that fish down there.
When on a Saturday, the wife directed chores at the fisherman's face, it was perhaps that phantom fish who stared back blank, then swam to windows crept across by frost.

The fisherman wanted an unwrit spread of ice to keep him from the wanting wife, the Monday time card punch. The river lured him to its marble palace floor He hacked a hole, then lowered a leaded line through slush. In steel-toed boots, above this small abyss, he made a slumpy stand.

Headphoned to the Pops, engrossed, he watched the far-off chimney wisps, oblivious to spider cracks. When the river chasmed under him, it was a blind plunge into white flame. His headphones drifted down to silt. He rolled like a walrus, body chub keeping him up as green currents pulled him seaward at a tilt. He felt the scarf his wife had knit an iron noose. He failed to feel his hands. His numb lips pressed to the river's spine, to suck slid inches of air. When he skimmed under the town rink, music blurred and bored into his hurt ears.

Maybe some grappling hook wielded by solid citizens would scoop him, heave him steaming onto the ice like a calved seal.
But the skaters' blades just cut scrollwork above his face.
Their blades went whisk, and he went out of reach.
Then out of his red mouth hole he hollered up for that world he'd craved so bad to leave, its bundled kids and Gap-clad teens.
His dumb heart slowed.
All this was very swift, and by the time the great gray fish with mandarin whiskers nosed his hand, he didn't know it wasn't the stony ghost of Grandpa Dan, watching his last breath flower into pale balloons, which soared above him in a drove. Through green haze his specter rose till he burst upon the velvet floor of Heaven.
There he was a wrought and burnished form reeled in and hoisted up to show.
The Resurrection

When death finally came, the cold crept in from his extremities.
From the far star points of his pinned form, the black ice inched at glacial pace.

We’re born to watch, and from that vigil care, even if one winds up pinioned to a stick, the heart’s blood gone sludge.
Maybe Christ felt his gaze coil small till the vacuum siphoned up his soul and murk filled the old frame, sprawling like squid ink.

How lonely he was for pain, for the splintered feet.

He ached for two hands made of meat he could reach to the end of.

Then in the core of the corpse the stone fist of his heart began to bang on the stiff chest’s door, and breath spilled back into that battered shape, the way warm water

shatters at birth, rivering every way.
Winter Term’s End

for Betsy Hogan

The student pokes her head into my cubicle.
She’s climbed the screw-thread stairs that spiral up to the crow’s nest where I work to bid goodbye.
She hands back books I lent.
I wave her to move papers from the spot she always took, worrying a sentence or a line; or come with protruded tongue to show a silver stud;
or bamboozled by some guy who can’t appreciate the dragon tattooed on her breast, the filigree around her thigh. This term she’s done with school.

Four years she’s siphoned every phrase, or anecdote, or quote that’s mine to dole.
She knows what I know,
or used to know, for in me sonnets fade.
Homer erodes
like sandstone worn by age.

Each year I grow emptier, more obsolete, can barely grope
to words that once hung iridescent in my skull.
When, thirty years back, I asked my beloved tutor how I’d ever pay him back, he said, It’s not that linear. You won’t pay me, only carry on this talk with someone else.

All his thoughts on Western Civ would melt like ice without this kid—hair dyed torch red, painted flames on her lug-sole boots.
She safety-pinned a plastic charm of Our Lady’s sacred heart to her sleeve.
Last night, to plot her destiny she hurled at the world map a lopsided dart and hit a South Seas flyspeck. Call collect, I say, if you get stuck. Read thus-and-such translation of Rilke only.
And though I sound like Polonius to myself, she scribbles down my platitudes like wisdom. When she turns to go, the spiral stair’s a gyroscope that hurls her into the wide circles of a life.
Without the grief of such departures, I’d live in the dull smear of my own profession, each kid a repeat, indistinct from the vanishing instants that mark us made.
The hand that holds this pen’s assembled by some force
I often fail to note, unless it’s newly manifest in a face.
She lent me wonder for a spell.

I loosed her in the labyrinth where I’ve meandered addled as a child, feeling along the string my teacher tied.
My eyes stare out from ever deeper sockets, edged in mesh.
I watch her cross the snow-swirled quad backpacked in hunter plaid, bent like an old scholar, moving with care across the slippery earth, till mist devours her.

Snow is falling over the quad, like rare pages shredded and dispersed by wind, that wild white filling every place we’ve stepped.
Pluck

That spring from a sky with a pallor like stone snow fell late and long to clog every road away from the house my marriage had withered in and whose mortgage I could scarce afford alone. Because my son was young and my paltry academic check went poof each month about day ten,
and because I had no stocks to cash, nor trust to tap, nor dour soft-touch uncle to woo into taking up slack, and because I’d grown too old and sad to sell my ass (whoredom also being a bad example for the kid in house), I developed pluck—
a trait much praised in Puritan texts, which favor the spiritual clarity suffering brings.
Pluck also keeps the low-cost, high-producing poor digging post holes or loading deep-fat fryers or holding tag sales where their poor peers come to haggle over silver pie-slicers once boxed special for a bride. Pity me not: I was not starved or harried by war.
But this was America, so poverty soured my shrunk soul to its nub.
Nights, I lay on my mattress on the floor, studying the clock face, whose each new digit seemed to edge me closer to death's brink.

Sleepless, I twisted on the spit of my own spine. Still, through no endeavor of my own, I one day woke to sun, then the splat of melt on ice crust. Soon grass pushed through the sodden earth.

Then the green tongues became a jungle overrun by crickets my son trapped dozens of in a pickle jar's sphere of sharp, upended air.

In an old aquarium, he laid a shaggy carpet of clover torn by fistfuls, set in hunks of apple and a mustard lid filled with water—all this covered with a screen, weighed down with the dictionary so the cats couldn't get in.

On Mothering Sunday, when one is obliged to revere and praise whatever bitch brought on to this hard world, my son led me down to a room where crickets sang as if I were the sun.

Which I was, I guess, to him, and he to me. After that, when a creditor rang to bark his threats of legal action, I set the phone down on the counter that he might hear the kingdom my boy boxed up—buzzing splendor from such crude creatures, woven through weeds, free for anyone to pluck.
The First Step

From your first step toward me I sprang to life, though stood stock still. Our gazes locked.
You ambled up, I couldn't move.
    My swagger stopped.
    My breezy bravura went windswept plain. I stood and let you come. For months we talked most nights, but the chair you occupied sat so far from mine, you were an island oasis watched through a telescope's wrong end.
    I barely heard the words your lush mouth shaped, just thirsted for your breath to come easing down my lungs. Each time that mouth politely said goodnight and turned away, then behind my bolted door and upon it, I softly banged my head.
    But then you said, one time, Just close your eyes, I wanna browse your face, as if I were a page. Then I was illuminated manuscript and sacred text.
We became horizon then, we laid down.
    Dawn's arms went wide to hold us.
    Then this shimmer descended to glaze our every instant—we got the best table, the quickest cab.
    The crosswalks told us go, the maitre d's right now. Spring leaves bent to brush our faces, till we whirled—are whirling—still. From that first step, I had to stop the turning world to breathe you in, and now tend always toward you, whom I ever was intended for.
