

Syracuse Scholar (1979-1991)

Volume 6
Issue 1 Syracuse Scholar Spring 1985

Article 9

1985

Between Alp and Sea

David Ray

Follow this and additional works at: <https://surface.syr.edu/susolar>

Part of the Poetry Commons

Recommended Citation

Ray, David (1985) "Between Alp and Sea," Syracuse Scholar (1979-1991): Vol. 6 : Iss. 1 , Article 9.
Available at: <https://surface.syr.edu/susolar/vol6/iss1/9>

This Poetry is brought to you for free and open access by SURFACE. It has been accepted for inclusion in Syracuse Scholar (1979-1991) by an authorized editor of SURFACE. For more information, please contact surface@syr.edu.

Between Alp and Sea

Samuel Ray, 1965–1984

David Ray is a Professor of English at the University of Missouri—Kansas City, where he also edits the literary quarterly New Letters. The author of several books of poems and a collection of short stories, he has taught at a number of colleges, including Syracuse University.

I was preparing for the great blow
but did not know it, had simply driven
the old car up the mountain road, afraid of the abyss all the time, thinking it was my death that might come at any moment,
the fall, fire, the scorched body,
the hell of being alone. But safe
atop the mountain, I strolled the village,
had coffee in the Square, then found a private ledge to view what stone age
man had waked to, many a dawn—blue valley
cut by river, silvered far below—
lazy scene at work, unmaking stone,
unmaking Alps, creating France.
And that stone age man,
out from his cave to squat, had left clear word for me, along with the view
he loved. Prepare to abandon all,
he said, blue hills, the woman rubbed
till she gleams, and son you thought safe over that sea, Oh happy happy son.

—David Ray