The Museum of Ideas: Fantastic Wilderness Park

Alyssa Goraieb
The Museum of Ideas:
Fantastic Wilderness Park

by

Alyssa Goraieb

Advised by Gregory Corso, in committee with Julia Czerniak and Janette Kim

Graduate Thesis Preparation Book
Syracuse University School of Architecture
TABLE OF CONTENTS

Contestation
Background
Project
...

CHAPTERS

01. Old Roots
02. Romantic Wilderness
03. American Wilderness
04. Myth of the Frontier
05. Preservation
06. Wild Wilderness
...

Research
Precedents
(Site)
References CONTENTION

The history of wilderness is the history of an idea. A missing element of the natural history museum is the human attitude within which nature is captured and displayed. This project wants to put the historical displays of the museum within a context by making an addition to the natural history museum that archives the historical attitudes, experiences and perceptions towards wilderness.

BACKGROUND

A current and common social understanding of wilderness can be at least partially attributed to the Wilderness Act of 1964, which determines wilderness as “an area where the earth and its community of life are untrammeled by man, where man himself is a visitor who does not remain”. However, it is now known that there is no such place that is unaffected by human beings in our globalized world – even the most pristine parklands are infiltrated with electromagnetic waves and subject to global warming.

The context of this project aligns with environmental historian William Cronon’s essay “The Trouble with Wilderness”. Wilderness, since the conception of the term, is always in opposition to human settlement and control. Wilderness doesn’t exist because it is a socially constructed idea that creates a dichotomy within nature, separating humans from the places or processes that are outside of control. Wilderness is an idea because it is an anthropogenic attitude towards the world, and as these attitudes have changed throughout history, the perception of wilderness has evolved as a result.

PROJECT

This project asks for a history of the wilderness idea to manifest itself physically within the city as an extension of the museum. The project will be a musenumification of ideas and perceptions, constructing an abstracted lineage of the idea of wilderness.

The human experience of wilderness can be fragmented and arranged under the following categorical banners: Old Roots, Romantic Wilderness, American Wilderness, Myth of the Frontier, Wilderness Preserved, and Wild Wilderness.

Each idea will be reproduced in its own fragment and juxtaposed with the staged scenes of the others. The fragments strung together will create an edited history of the wilderness idea.

Defining the Ideas
Through an edited reading of environmental history, the attitude and experience of wilderness can be broken down into descriptive words and formal/material characteristics. These will be used to determine values in each fragment of history.

A Museum Reconstruction
Through an abstraction of the experiential/formal/material characteristics of each idea, a reproduction of each wilderness idea can be designed. Natural history museums typically include fragments of nature within its building which are then systematically organized based on a scientific taxonomy. The fragments are decontextualized, and then recontextualized within the museum setting, juxtaposed with like specimens and decorations. The scenes created in the habitat dioramas are meant to display real moment in time; although in reality, the scene is a composition of pieces from different origins, age, or material composition that tell a story to an audience. Using the museum’s tools of display; fragmentation, decontextualization, abstraction and juxtaposition, new forms and experiences can emerge in the reproduction.

Fantastic Wilderness Park
The attitude/experience from each idea scene is further abstracted to include programmatic elements that support the experience characteristics of each idea. The idea scenes should be juxtaposed into a larger whole that creates the Fantastic Wilderness Park.
The perception towards wilderness in America begins with the attitudes brought by settlers from Europe. This attitude relies primarily on a biblical understanding of wilderness as a savage, barren, and desolate place. Wilderness is inhospitable and dangerous; the residence of the devil and things evil. Wilderness is always in contrast to the settlement. Biblically, the wilderness is in contrast with the Garden of Eden, where the Garden was once for Adam and Eve a worldly paradise, where humans can live naked without shame, living among animals and fruit bearing trees.

Garden of Eden

- characteristics:
  - pleasure,
  - delight,
  - paradise,

- program:
  1. botanical garden
  2. resting places
  3. restaurant
  4. orchard

- formal/material:
  5. controlled climate:
    - humidity and temperature
  6. separation from exterior

Wilderness

- characteristics
  - savage,
  - inhospitable,
  - barren,
  - desolate,
  - waste

- program:
  - program-less,
  - forest - inhospitable
By the eighteenth century, the perception of the previously feared wilderness had evolved into a sacred and awe-inspiring terror. Wilderness became a supernatural landscape, where one was most likely to find themselves face-to-face with the divine. Through the sublime doctrine of theorists such as Edmond Burke, Immanuel Kant, and William Gilpin, wilderness was celebrated for its sacred, powerful and supernatural qualities. America’s first national parks; Yosemite, Yellowstone, Ranier, Grand Canyon, and Zion; all express the value system of the Romantics of which they judged wilderness.

Sublime

characteristics:
- sacred,
- powerful,
- terror,
- awe,
- supernatural,
- wild

program:
- 5. canyons
- 6. mountains
- 7. framed views
- 8. ruin-follies
- 9. waterfall
- 10. rainbows
The westward expansion of American colonization relied on an attitude of necessary conquering of the wilderness. The Old World attitudes still had resonance in the frontier, and settler did what they could to clear the wilderness. The land was savage, whose transformation represented the dawn of America.

On the other hand, a second source of wilderness enthusiasm emerged in the American frontier. An independent and free America recognized a wilderness that was different than any landscape Europe had seen that was truly ‘American’. This image became a source of national identity.

“But even as it came to embody the awesome power of the sublime, wilderness was also being tamed—not just by those who were building settlements in its midst but also by those who most celebrated its inhuman beauty. By the second half of the nineteenth century, the terrible awe that Wordsworth and Thoreau regarded as the appropriately pious stance to adopt in the presence of their mountaintop God was giving way to a much more comfortable, almost sentimental demeanor. As more and more tourists sought out the wilderness as a spectacle to be looked at and enjoyed for its great beauty, the sublime in effect became domesticated.”

1 William Cronon, “The Trouble with Wilderness; or, Getting Back to the Wrong Nature”
“Among the core elements of the frontier myth was the powerful sense among certain groups of Americans that wilderness was the last bastion of rugged individualism... This nostalgia for a passing frontier way of life inevitably implied ambivalence, if not downright hostility, toward modernity and all that it represented. If one saw the wild lands of the frontier as freer, truer, and more natural than other, more modern places, then one was also inclined to see the cities and factories of urban-industrial civilization as confining, false, and artificial.”

Primitivism for the wealthy for visiting recreation tourism escape manly

program:
14. country club
15. tennis courts
14. whiskey lounge
15. gift shop
16. stadium

William Cronon, “The Trouble with Wilderness; or, Getting Back to the Wrong Nature”
“In the myth of the vanishing frontier lay the seeds of wilderness preservation in the United States, for if wild land had been so crucial in the making of the nation, then surely one must save its last remnants as monuments to the American past—and as an insurance policy to protect its future.”

valuable resource exhaustable

ecology management stewardship nature reserves regulation
“Wild, then, is not synonymous with pristine or virgin. Rather, it is the state wherein those evolutionary processes of an area’s genesis—free from human purpose, utility, or design—are allowed to shape its future. Thus, not requiring the absence of all human effect, wildness can persist in environments that have been altered or continue to be influenced by external human factors such as climate change—as long as we refrain from interfering with nature’s autonomous response.”

- Robert Kaye

Wildness

alone to evolve
American Wilderness

1. botanical garden
2. resting places
3. restaurant
4. orchard
5. petting zoo
5. inverted mountain
6. ruin-follies, temple
7. expansive views
7. temple
8. bathrooms
9. work barns (cabin)
10. stump forest
11. gardening
12. pasture

-

abandoned wilderness

film towers

wall
Myth of the Frontier

1. botanical garden
2. resting places
3. restaurant
4. orchard
5. petting zoo
6. inverted mountain
7. expansive views
8. bathrooms
9. work barns (cabins)
10. stump forest
11. gardening
12. pasture
13. whiskey lounge
14. gift shop

- abandoned wilderness
- film towers
- wall
Preservation
16. monitoring station
17. education
History of the Wilderness Idea

Early example of a natural history cabinet of curiosities

"The Kunstkammer was regarded as a microcosm or theater of the world, and a memory theater. The Kunstkammer conveyed symbolically the patron's control of the world through its indoor microscopic reproduction."

OLD ROOTS

Display Technique

1700-1667
-1600 1667 1700 1750

William Gilpin

“Paradise Lost” John Milton

"picturesque" "composition" "pictures"

1757, Edmond Burke’s A Philosophical Enquiry into the Origin of our Ideas of the Sublime and the Beautiful

Jean-Jacques Rousseau Theory of Natural Human

ROMANTIC WILDERNESS

mountain as cathedral

1800 1830 1850 1862 1864

Indian Removal Act by President Jackson

"wild" "powerful"

"sacred" "terror"

"awe"

Henry David Thoreau Preservation of wilderness as sanctuary for man

1869 1872 1872

America’s first wildland park Yosemite

AMERICAN WILDERNESS

"delight" "pleasure" "spectacle"

Robert Marshall summarized wilderness as “its entire freedom from the manifestations of human will...”

It is difficult to distinguish between natural and artificial. Wild is not synonymous with virgin or pristine — it does not require the absence of human effect.

“Tiergeographische Gruppen”

First habitat diorama opens at the Grand Ducal Museum in Darmstadt, Germany

"The Kunstkammer was regarded as a microcosm or theater of the world, and a memory theater. The Kunstkammer conveyed symbolically the patron's control of the world through its indoor microscopic reproduction.”

Jean-Jacques Rousseau Theory of Natural Human

"powerful" "wild" "picturesque"

History of the Wilderness Idea
NOTES

1. “The Trouble with Wilderness; or, Getting Back to the Wrong Nature” William Cronon
2. Taxidermist at work Smithsonian-Roosevelt African Expedition Specimens, with the East African Lions in the foreground, c. 1911. Image from Smithsonian Institution Archives
4. Satan in Eden 1866 (From Paradise Lost by John Milton) — Gustave Doré
5. Caspar David Friedrich, Wanderer above the Sea of Fog, 1817, Kunsthalle Hamburg. Romantic artists during the 19th century used the epic of nature as an expression of the sublime
7. Enraving from Ferrante Imperato, Dell’Historia Naturale (Naples 1599)
The Habitat Diorama

The habitat diorama groups objects from different areas of a same biozone. The collection of objects in the scene creates new and unnatural juxtapositions.

Assemblage and Juxtaposition

A Map of biozones in North America

B Background painting

C Taxidermy reconstruction

D Scene

E Frame

F Ground and Plants

James Perry Wilson in Mule Deer diorama at the American Museum of Natural History, 1943. Photograph by Thanos Johnson Tank scene for "A Guy Named Joe" (1944), MGM studio lot. [via Matte Shot] https://placesjournal.org/article/turning-on-the-fantasy-fountain/

The Gettysburg Panorama. Illustration from "Scientific America" (1886).
Bernard Tschumi
early options based on urban setting, scale, proximity to natural history museum and cultural centers, and open green space
BIBLIOGRAPHY

The history of wilderness is the history of an idea. A missing element of the natural history museum is the human attitude within which nature is captured and displayed. This project wants to put the historical displays of the museum within a context by making an addition to the natural history museum that archives the historical attitudes, experiences and perceptions towards wilderness.

A current and common social understanding of wilderness can be at least partially attributed to the Wilderness Act of 1964, which determines wilderness as “an area where the earth and its community of life are untrammeled by man, where man himself is a visitor who does not remain”. However, it is now known that there is no such place that is unaffected by human beings in our globalized world – even the most pristine parklands are infiltrated with electromagnetic waves and subject to global warming.

Wilderness, since the conception of the term, is always in opposition to human settlement and control. Wilderness doesn’t exist because it is a socially constructed idea that creates a dichotomy within nature, separating humans from the places or processes that are outside of control. Wilderness is an idea because it is an anthropogenic attitude towards the world, and as these attitudes have changed throughout history, the perception of wilderness has evolved as a result. Critically assessing the historical techniques of display, the new wilderness museum is designed to frame and recreate American paradigms of wilderness.
The history of wilderness is the history of an idea. A missing element of the natural history museum is the human attitude within which nature is captured and displayed. This project wants to put the historical displays of the museum within a context by making an addition to the natural history museum that archives the historical attitudes, experiences and perceptions towards wilderness.

A current and common social understanding of wilderness can be at least partially attributed to the Wilderness Act of 1964, which determines wilderness as “an area where the earth and its community of life are untrammeled by man, where man himself is a visitor who does not remain”. However, it is now known that there is no such place that is unaffected by human beings in our globalized world – even the most pristine parklands are infiltrated with electromagnetic waves and subject to global warming.

Wilderness, since the conception of the term, is always in opposition to human settlement and control. Wilderness doesn’t exist because it is a socially constructed idea that creates a dichotomy within nature, separating humans from the places or processes that are outside of control. Wilderness is an idea because it is an anthropogenic attitude towards the world, and as these attitudes have changed throughout history, the perception of wilderness has evolved as a result. Critically assessing the historical techniques of display, the new wilderness museum is designed to frame and recreate American paradigms of wilderness.