Signs of Spring

EVERY YEAR, WHEN THOSE OF US IN SYRACUSE are wondering if spring will ever come, the anniversary of the University's founding on March 24, 1870, arrives. This annual event gives us an opportunity to reflect on our heritage and display some well-deserved Orange pride.

Originally founded as Genesee College in Lima, New York, Syracuse University began as the hopeful dream of Methodist Episcopal Church leaders. A few years later it was relocated to Syracuse, which was considered a more suitable home for an emerging institution of higher learning with a national reputation.

As part of the Syracuse University alumni family, I hope you show your SU pride every day. I also hope that each year when the third week of March approaches—hopefully with the first signs of spring in upstate New York—you will pause and think about your beloved alma mater and your time on the Hill. Think about those who came before you and helped make our University great. Consider the students who are here today, benefiting from the commitment and generosity of thousands of alumni. Stop and think about what you can do to be a loyal alumnus, such as joining your local alumni club, giving to the academic program of your choice, or buying a paver in the Orange Grove. How you choose to express your gratitude and commitment to SU is a personal decision. I only ask that you make a decision and act on it.

Multicolored Cheers

When John Trever '65 recalls the day the Syracuse University football team played Holy Cross during his junior year, it isn't the game he remembers, but the action in the stands. Armed with a bullhorn, he stood on the field and directed fellow students in one of the University's most colorful traditions: placard cheering. Signaling fans to hold up the correct colored placard at the precisely timed moment, Trever, along with classmates Diane Dusingberre '65 and James Marshall '65, helped orchestrate the simulated image of an arrow flying toward its target—the Holy Cross eagle mascot. "My first love was placard cheering," said Trever, an editorial cartoonist at the Albuquerque (New Mexico) Journal. "It was fun to design those cheers and see my ideas come to reality."

Trever was a member of the Traditions Commission, a long-standing student-run group that organized freshman orientation activities and initiated and encouraged participation in countless campus traditions. The group introduced placard cheering at SU in 1950, adopting the practice from other schools. The commission also oversaw the "Goon Squad," a group of sophomores who organized placard cheering as part of their overall duties to familiarize freshmen with college life.

As Trever recalls, before each football game in Archbold Stadium, Goons ushered freshmen (or "frosh," as they were called) into the student section, presenting them with the tools for placard cheering: a "laundry slip" that listed the cheers planned for the game and indicated which color placard to hold up at a particular time, and three two-sided placards of blue, orange, yellow, red, white, or green. During the game, junior and senior Traditions Commission members called out cheers from the field, choosing from a repertoire that included a halftime salute to the band (placards depicted a yellow trumpet and the word BAND against a green backdrop), a recreation of the colorful NBC peacock for use during televised games, and the "taming" of the Penn State Nittany Lion (LION followed by PURR).

Pulling off these spirited feats required a tremendous amount of pregame planning. Trever remembers a labor-intensive process that involved tedious logistical coordination on the part of Traditions Commission members. They first designed the cheers on graph paper to determine which colors were needed to create the desired effect and where and when the placards should be displayed. Next, they assigned colors for each cheer to more than 1,000 seats in the stadium. "We sat around a long table in the Women's Building, passed the laundry slips out, and marked them up individually with colored pencils," Trever says with a laugh. "This was in the days before computers!"

Despite their best efforts the cheers rarely came off without a hitch.

"Placard cheering provided a nice splash of color," Trever says. "But there was always someone holding up the wrong card." He says the best view of placard cheering went to the alumni who sat across the field. "I remember one cheer designed especially for them," he says. "Imagine the word 'ALUMS' flashed against a sea of orange—the first four letters in white, and the final letter a green dollar sign."

The tradition of placard cheering remained popular with SU students for two decades, until the Traditions Commission decided to end it in 1970. At that time, the group reorganized its activities in response to the changing mood on campus, a reflection of the increasing political, social, and cultural upheaval across the nation. Although placard cheering fell by the wayside, the commission continued to carry on such SU traditions as planning orientation activities for incoming freshmen. "You expected these kinds of traditions and looked forward to them," says Trever. "It was an important part of the University experience." —Lindsay Beller

A Grand Time on the Great Lakes

The ships that once transported people and freight throughout the Great Lakes region were retired during the 1920s and '30s. However, in recent years the grand tradition of cruising on the lakes has returned, and a group of SU alumni took advantage of this fantastic adventure last fall. "We really enjoyed ourselves," says Thomas Gaughan, director of gift and estate planning in SU's Division of Institutional Advancement. Gaughan co-hosted the tour with his wife Karen, senior director of development in the College of Human Services and Health Professions.

Alumni spent the first day and night of the tour in Port Huron, Michigan, Thomas Edison's birthplace. "The whole city of Port Huron is devoted to Edison," says Gaughan, who spent a night at the Thomas Edison Inn. "A movie recounting Edison's life, starring Mickey Rooney, is played regularly at the town's theater, and two museums feature Edison's inventions."

The next day the passengers were comfortably settled on board the MV

Columbus, a 6-deck, 472-foot cruise ship built in 1997 that boasts such amenities as a library, an exercise room with a sauna, two restaurants, two bars, a swimming pool, boutique, hair salon, and photo lab. The ship began its journey heading north on Lake Huron into Georgian Bay, then traveled to Lake Superior and Lake Michigan before returning to Port Huron. The vessel sailed at night, arriving at its given destination at dawn. Once docked, passengers could disembark and see the sights at their own pace, or join such daily shoreline excursions as visiting museums, shopping, and exploring the coastal cities. "The cruise ship is absolutely beautiful," Gaughan says.

"Some members of our group didn't want to leave the boat."

At the ship's first stop at Manitoulin Island, Ontario, alumni took a trail hike around Little Current, the island's largest city; viewed a Native art exhibition; and watched an Indian dance and drum event. From there, they traveled through the narrow North Channel—only 20 miles across at its widest point—and landed at Sault Ste. Marie, where they enjoyed a train ride through dense forests and imposing granite bluffs into Agawa Canyon. Next, the ship made a loop into Lake Superior and headed south back to Michigan, making its last stop at Mackinac Island, where members of the tour group visited the world-renowned Grand Hotel. "We were amazed by the beauty of the hotel and grounds," Gaughan says. "We were impressed with everything—the whole cruise was absolutely delightful."

Worldwide Partnerships

In 1971, James J. DeCaro G'77 joined the faculty of a new technological college in upstate New York—the National Technical Institute for the Deaf (NTID) at Rochester Institute of Technology.

At the time, DeCaro held bachelor's and master's degrees in civil engineering, and expected to stay at NTID for only a year or two before pursuing a Ph.D. in engineering. However, shortly after joining the faculty, DeCaro met and married Patricia A. Mudgett, an educator of students who are deaf. He remained at the institute and built his reputation as a respected teacher, instructional developer, department chair, and center director, and served as dean from 1985-98. "Destiny and luck played their hands and I found my life's work," says DeCaro, who earned a doctorate in instructional technology from the SU School of Education.

Today, after more than three decades at NTID, DeCaro knows his commitment to educating students who are deaf is far from over—and it now reaches around the globe. As a 1979-80 Rotary International Scholar at the University of Newcastle-upon-Tyne in England, and a 1998-99 Senior Fulbright Scholar at Örebro University in Sweden, he witnessed the need around the world for educational technology for students who are deaf, and was inspired to become involved in international deaf education. He collaborated with Robert R. Davila G'72 (RIT vice president for NTID who was appointed to the National Council on Disability by President George W. Bush) to create partnerships with universities worldwide that will share knowledge for the benefit of students who are deaf studying in technological fields.

NTID pitched the pair's idea to The Nippon Foundation of Japan, which awarded the institute more than $2 million in grants to create the Postsecondary Education Network International (PEN-International). In turn, the organization has brought technology to thousands of students in Asia and the Pacific Rim. "Simply because of deafness, young people have been deprived of the social and economic benefits society has to offer," says DeCaro, the program's principal investigator and director. "PEN-International provides an opportunity to change those circumstances."

The grant program shares instructional technology and educational expertise with colleges in Russia, the Philippines, Japan, and China, where faculty members are being trained in educational technology. "Today we're faced with horrible events that are driving wedges between nations and peoples," DeCaro says. "Now, more than ever, we need multinational collaborative programming. We must work all the harder to build bridges for positive change."

Optimistic Expectations

Anyone who thinks English majors aren't cut out for the business world should meet University Trustee Eric Mower '66, G'68, chair and CEO of Eric Mower and Associates (EMA), a marketing and communications firm headquartered in Syracuse.

Moved to study literature by an early sense of himself as a writer, Mower feels the experience helped him hone his analytical skills and writing abilities while providing him with a context to develop a personal core of beliefs. "The humanities offer you a sense of values, a sense of proportion, and a wide-ranging comprehension of the forces of life, be they social, political, or economic," he says. "I don't believe you can be fully successful in the business world without a firm grasp of all these things. This is certainly true in my business."

Mower arrived on the Hill from Queens, New York, in the early '60s, earning a B.A. degree in English from the College of Arts and Sciences and an M.A. degree in mass communications from the S.I. Newhouse School of Public Communications. Joining a small company in Syracuse, he built it into the largest and most influential firm of its kind in upstate New York. With four offices across the state, as well as in Portsmouth, New Hampshire, and Atlanta, EMA has a client list that features such Fortune 500 companies as Eastman Kodak, Fisher-Price, General Electric, the Ford Motor Company, and Welch's Foods.

Mower—whose many professional and civic activities include leadership positions with the Business Council of New York State, the American Association of Advertising Agencies, and the Erie Canalway National Heritage Corridor Commission—has served as a member of the University's Board of Trustees since 1990. He is not shy about expressing a deep sense of gratitude and affection for SU. "My high school grades were horrible," he says. "No other university would admit me, but Syracuse has always been generous in the optimistic expectations it places on people. Someone noticed I had been the editor of my high school newspaper and had good college board scores, and so SU accepted me. I think there is something very American in the fiber of SU's spirit. The school has always opened its arms and offered opportunities to people who might otherwise be excluded."

On campus last fall, Mower delivered a timely address, "Lessons in Reputation Management," as part of the School of Management's Martin and Phyllis Berman Distinguished Lecture Series. Referring to the spate of scandals that have rocked the business world recently, he told an audience composed mostly of aspiring executives that "a strong ethical foundation is a business asset" and urged students to make sure it is something they cultivate as part of their education. He is just as adamant about the continuing importance of developing personal skills of expression. "The ability to master the printed word—whether it's writing an effective letter or editing a much-too-long business plan—is a primary requisite for the business world," he says. "Success comes quicker when superior written and verbal skills are present."

A Stunning Literary Success

One might not expect a novel about the murder and dismemberment of a 14-year-old girl to be enthusiastically embraced by enough readers to make it a best-seller. In fact, novelist Alice Sebold '84 remembers even her editor had reservations about the harsh subject matter of The Lovely Bones and wouldn't have bought the manuscript if not for the author's tender treatment of its difficult content.

Sebold recalls the editor telling her, "Thank God I got to read it." Evidently, reviewers and readers are similarly grateful for Sebold's contribution to the literary world. This gripping debut novel, in which protagonist Susie Salmon tells her own story from the surprising perspective of heaven, created a stir among reviewers even before its July release. Since then, the book has been widely praised in reviews that describe it as "mesmerizing," "emotionally penetrating," "lyrical," "powerful," and—most often—simply "beautiful."

The Lovely Bones (Little, Brown and Company) is Sebold's second book. Her first, Lucky (Scribner), published in 1999, is a memoir that recounts her sexual assault as an 18-year-old freshman at Syracuse and the legal and personal aftermath of that attack. Sebold says she was inspired to tell the true story of her own experience after beginning work on the novel. "I wrote Lucky to get my own business out of the way," she says. "I needed to unload my story someplace else, so Susie wouldn't have to do my storytelling for me."

Sebold wanted the novel to be purely fictional, even if part of what informs the scene of violence in the beginning was based on her own experience. "I feel a deep connection to girls who didn't survive their assaults," she says. "After I was raped, there was a period when I had much more in common with those girls than I did with the girls at Syracuse who were going to frat parties."

Sebold, a graduate of the College of Arts and Sciences, credits former SU creative writing professor Tobias Wolff with encouraging her to "remember everything," advice she believes has contributed to her success as a writer of both fiction and nonfiction. Also a graduate of the M.F.A. writing program at the University of California, Irvine, Sebold has worked as a teacher and has written for The New York Times Magazine and other publications. She lives in Southern California with her husband, writer Glen David Gold, and is currently at work on another novel. "I worked my whole life to be able to do nothing but write books," she says. "Now I have that opportunity, so I'm going to grab it." —Amy Shires

Bridge to the Past

When Joan Fortgang Schepps G'53 took up the card game of bridge as a child, little did she know that she would one day own the largest collection of trump indicators (marker pieces used in the game) in the United States.

At last count, Schepps had 600 pieces in her collection, which she has displayed at museums, universities, the World Bridge Olympiad, tournaments, and antique shows. In fact, she's amazed at the variety of trump indicators that exist, covering virtually any subject. "I had no idea there are so many beautiful pigs out there among the indicators," says Schepps, a School of Education graduate who lives in Holyoke, Massachusetts.

Schepps wasn't sure what she was buying when she found her first trump indicator, a small porcelain chicken whose head spins so its beak can point to the appropriate trump suit, or "No Trump"—indicated on the chicken's collar. "It put a smile on my face, so I bought it," says Schepps, who is attracted to anything with a card motif.

She started researching the whimsical objects and learned the indicators, which date from the late 1800s to the early 1930s, were used in the game of whist and early forms of bridge to remind players which suit was trump. She added to her collection with vintage Disney characters, clowns, assorted animals, folk art, and art deco pieces. The indicators are made from wood, metal, porcelain, or Bakelite, and—like her original chicken—use a creative way to designate trump. For instance, one of her metal pieces features a woman standing with a greyhound whose tail moves and points to the card suits, which are painted on a fence post. According to Schepps, there are only two other collections like hers in the world—one in Italy and the other in England. "I've been to Milan and I'll be going to London," she says.

Schepps, who holds the rank of Silver Life Master and writes a bridge column, plans to return to campus for Reunion Weekend 2003 and display 300 of her indicators. When she was a student she initiated the first bridge tournament for sororities at SU. "In the '50s, it seemed like the whole Syracuse world played bridge," she says. "You could find a game at the dorm or sorority house any time of day, even in the 15 minutes between classes."

Responding to International Media

For Raanan Gissin G'75, G'78, G'79, crisis is a way of life. The senior advisor to Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon starts each day at around 4:30 a.m., scanning newspapers and preparing to brief Sharon during their daily 7 a.m. phone call.

With Israel one of the most volatile—and talked about—trouble spots in the world, Gissin rarely gets a quiet day. He is inundated with interview requests and works 18-hour days to keep up with international news cycles. “I operate on continuous deadlines,” says Gissin, who has been the prime minister’s official spokesman to the foreign press since May 1999. “Most of the time the foreign media want quick reactions to events, and they usually want to do it live. With the Israeli clock seven hours ahead of the United States, that makes for a long day.”

Still, Gissin is well versed in working under prolonged pressure. As a colonel with the Israel Defense Forces during the Gulf War, he directed Israel’s foreign press center in Tel Aviv, catering to around 1,000 journalists. He often did live interviews while Scud missiles exploded around their position.

The role of official spokesperson was not one that Gissin had in mind when he left Syracuse University in 1979 with a master’s degree in television-radio-film from the S.I. Newhouse School of Public Communications and master’s and Ph.D. degrees in political science from the Maxwell School. “I thought I’d work in long-term strategic planning,” Gissin says. “But during the war in Lebanon, my commander told me, ‘I have about 10 or 12 strategic planners, but I don’t have one guy who can speak decent English in front of a camera.’ He sent me to Beirut and I began to handle the press there.”

Gissin says the combination of political and communications training has proved extremely useful, allowing him to translate Israel’s actions and strategies to the public through the media. Yet, despite his training, Gissin says today’s “hit-and-run” style of news poses a challenge for Israel. “It’s difficult to show the world why we are doing what we do because people have preconceptions and prejudices that are often fueled by our enemies,” he says. “In addition, our message can sometimes be garbled or seem contradictory because we don’t always speak in one voice—to do that would not be in the nature of a democracy.”

Last year, certain Israeli military actions toward the Palestinians brought condemnation from such institutions as the Vatican and the United Nations. Gissin’s reaction is simple: “The truth, the truth, the truth,” he says. “We state our case very clearly and try to take the press with us to show that this is a war. We admit it when we make mistakes—so the world may rebuke us—but when we take harsh measures, we can also explain them. We’re fighting for our survival, it’s as simple as that.”

Celebrating Latino Culture

Magdalena Thomson Garcia G'92 remembers a question posed by one of her College of Visual and Performing Arts professors, the late Herb Williams. "What is the purpose of ethnic museums?" Williams asked the class.

Garcia was knowledgeable about art history and museums, but wasn't sure about the need for museums that focused on a specific population. "I'm here to find out," she replied.

Garcia must have liked what she learned. After earning a master's degree in museum studies, she returned to her childhood hometown of Omaha, Nebraska, where she conceived the idea of a Hispanic museum and cultural center. In 1993, Garcia's dream became a reality when El Museo Latino (www.elmuseolatino.org) was established, becoming the first Latino art and history museum and cultural center in the Midwest. "Professor Williams's question made me see the value of maintaining and continuing cultural traditions—esthetic and historical," Garcia says. "Museums like this also offer non-Hispanic populations the opportunity to learn."

The museum, which now welcomes more than 53,000 visitors annually, received the 1996 Sower Award from the Nebraska Humanities Council and the 2002 Governor's Arts Awards-Heritage Award for overall excellence. In 1995, Garcia was honored as the Omaha YWCA's Woman of Distinction in the Arts and Humanities. "She really has a gift," says Terrence Ferguson, chair of the Nebraska Arts Council. "We are grateful she's here."

Garcia has created a center for permanent and touring exhibitions, including CHOMARI Ballet Folklorico Mexicano, which presents traditional dances native to various regions of Mexico; annual festivals celebrating Cinco de Mayo and Hispanic Heritage Month; bilingual computer classes, art classes, and school programs. The museum also has an artists-in-residence program that brings visiting artists into the local schools, and has established a cultural exchange with the University of Chihuahua in Mexico.

Garcia says her journey back to her roots was nurtured at SU. She credits VPA professor Edward Aiken, chair of the museum studies graduate program, as being a mentor, and fondly recalls a class in gallery design and installation. "We were encouraged to pursue our individual interests," she says. "I still love to work on the wide range of curatorial and exhibit designs for each exhibition."

Looking back on that day a decade ago when El Museo Latino opened, Garcia remembers Herb Williams calling to congratulate her. Referring to his question about ethnic museums, he told her, "I see that you learned." —Suzanne Arney
