The Syracuse University Saxophone Ensemble is one of numerous small ensembles within the Syracuse University School of Music, College of Visual and Performing Arts. The saxophone ensemble is under the direction of Dr. Ronald L. Caravan, clarinet and saxophone professor at Syracuse University.

Formed in 1980, the group has played before campus, community, and public school audiences in the Syracuse area as well as in other parts of New York State and neighboring states. The ensemble has also performed at music conventions, including the annual N.Y. State School Music Association Conference.

Featuring soprano, alto, tenor, baritone, and bass saxophones in consort, the ensemble's repertoire consists of original works for the medium as well as transcriptions from sources such as literature for strings or keyboard. The ensemble program also includes performance of literature for the standard medium of the saxophone quartet as well as other combinations.

The saxophone was developed around 1841 by the famous Belgian instrument maker Adolphe Sax. When combined in the ensemble—a "classical," non-jazz setting—the saxophones produce a warm, sonorous quality comparable to that of an organ or even human voices.
